Heritage, planning and development in Edinburgh by John Bury; Head of Planning, the City of Edinburgh Council

Cities exist for many reasons, and the diversity of urban forms can be traced to the complex functions that cities perform. Town planners and architects must weave a complex, ever-changing array of elements (networks, buildings, open spaces) into a working whole. A responsive and clear framework for the sustainable growth of a city safeguards the long term prosperity of its inhabitants. Different cities, however, have to face different economic, social and environmental challenges and adapt to new demands and expectations. It becomes even more challenging if a place, space or an area is found in a historic context where preservation of the 'old' is as important as development of the 'new'.
